A Profusion of Parallel Tracks: Why Mongolian Roads of Dirt and Gravel Branch, Multiply, and Fuse Endlessly

Bill Yake
yake@comcast.net

Recommended Citation

This Poetry is posted at Research Online.
http://ro.ecu.edu.au/landscapes/vol7/iss1/9
A Profusion of Parallel Tracks: Why Mongolian Roads of Dirt and Gravel Branch, Multiply, and Fuse Endlessly

Whether crossing mountains, steppes, or the Gobi, we meet no fences.

The way is paved with fragments of bone; the insistent long lift of winds that breathe out sage and the fragrance of crushed onion sprigs. We are our own police. and though there are few bridges, we will find a thousand fords. Having learned from nimble horses to innovate—we dodge the washboard rattle, the boil of dust, the shock-shattering potholes, and winter’s brickhard ruts. We juke the herds of random camels & randy goats that balk and bolt to uncertain rhythms. We make do.

You dally, my friend, and I will swing wide & forge another passing lane.

-Bill Yake

Bill Yake examined water, sediment and air quality for environmental agencies before retiring to focus on poetry, travel and natural history. His collections include This Old Riddle: Cormorants and Rain and Unfurl, Kite, and Veer. In addition to having been featured on National Public Radio, his poems show up in magazines and anthologies serving the environmental and literary communities—from Wilderness Magazine to Anthropology and Humanism, from Open Spaces Quarterly to Fine Madness, from Rattle to ISLE. Other interests include photography, natural history, evolution and hiking.