Dispersion of Seed, Stirling Range by John Ryan

a gap in the range
along Chester Pass Road, where bullanock grow
on charcoaled soils;

we have come to see wild things, anxious as furred buds, instead lying on the road verge-

the sun-baked corpse of an old kill, wincing its last breath, grains sprawled about, its guts;

umber burlap bleached
tawny brown and riven, spilling maggots and stones in difficult morning light;

Hoodini escapee from roadtrains, persona non grata at an ill-fated wedding where wheat sullied the rice;

interloper on an island of mallee and wattles, sweeping the understory in a bile yellow peristalsis.

habitats become habits — all the shades of saffron and sinopia signify the storm of spring as we know it or djilba as it has been called;

these worlds, sharp with edges that overlap and occlude, curl up one day like fern fronds shrivel the next, dispersing.

John C. Ryan is a second-year Ph.D. candidate at Edith Cowan University. His dissertation invokes the writer-as-botanist tradition of John Clare, Henry David Thoreau, and Pablo Neruda to create poetic interpretations of the unusual and stunning flora of Southwest Australia. He is a graduate of the University of Lancaster's M.A. in Environmental Philosophy, and his research interests include ecophilosophy, landscape writing, and the human-plant relationship.
