Birdlife

Andrew Taylor

Edith Cowan University

Recommended Citation
Birdlife

These gulls drifting on the sky manoeuvre the Atlantic wind with effortless displays of arrogance, their savage grace at home along an African coast washed pale by winter sun.
This is their strip of power their long domain of ocean and rock stretching beyond history.
Their wars are pure and personal – over a fish-head or a rock to roost their triumphs swallowed by the wind as quick as their rasping cry.
But these pert sparrows darting between pots have come with the Berbers. Plump parvenus they scavenge the crevices of human life in comfortable complicity. Not for them a heroics of ocean sky and salt or the wings of a gale. They scout a hotel terrace, natter among themselves compare their latest meals, measure the drift of shadow across an afternoon and find pleasure in being nondescript.

January 2001