China Landscapes by Glen Phillips

China Landscape 1
Summer

Whining accordian in a slow South China afternoon; the cicadas seethe and fry in the fat of jungle trees.

China Landscape 2
Winter

Weak sun by the river wall blotched the pavement beneath unleafed willows. The benches hosted other figures also slumped against the chill wind from Shandong.

I had come here to contemplate, to know the way, to gather energy for renewal. Ships and barges close by on the Huang Pu clanked at work or hooted warnings.

Graffiti on the wall’s rough stone warned us to review the path ahead and one songless bird fluttered futilely, escaping twigs and branches.
Suddenly a child flew a bright kite.

China Landscape 3
Spring

Snow had long lifted from the grassland and meadow flowers began their spring offensive. You took your son’s hand and walked some way along dirt roads.
He said, ‘Mother, the geese have returned from wintering south. Soon father and I will go hunting. You’ll see what I’ve learned.’
China Landscape 4

Autumn

In Hebei’s mountains bare persimmon trees are laden with setting suns, amber in the mist. And the memory of you is heaped autumnally like these warm fruits ready for sale.

Set before farmhouse after farmhouse not only are persimmons but apples, incandescent mounds of plums or saffron apricots, sallow pears.

Meanwhile firewood enough to roar high in clay-fired chimneys is stacked hectic as preparations for feasting a bride and groom in these autumn days that will bring me hopefully to you.
