everyone knows what pelicans look like by Scott-Patrick Mitchell despite the planning, despite the superfluous, these pelicans appear evenly sitting on lamp-posts along the Kwinana heading north, toward the city

. these pelicans look at heaven & all they can muster is a yawn

. they have no interest in the myth & astrology human's have wedged into the dawning night sky

. the unmerging bumper exhaust sloth chaos beneath them is also a human distraction

. occasionally a car-crash sparkling glass bitumen diamond glints their attention

, but they do not dive

. instead they eye
, are engrossed by the algae-blossoming swan rivering fishes to swim the indian sun

Scott-Patrick Mitchell is a poet and writes for OUTinPerth. He's the editor of the incredibly irregular yet utterly underground literary street art zine MoTHER [has words...] plus the winner of the 2009 PressPress Chapbook Award. In 2010 he will be appearing in major collections being published by both Fremantle Press and Puncher & Wattman, all the while studying for his Masters in performance poetry at Edith Cowan University.
