Robinson's Lookout Lismore

Peter Mitchell
Robinson’s Lookout Lismore by Peter Mitchell

The first candle-breath of morning ends the restlessness honeycombing the sleep of night. Even though nerves are guitar-string tight, I crunch over ground webbed with nets of ice in a cocoon of warm clothes to the breadloaf of Robinson’s Lookout.

To the west, the penicillium moon blue-veins the horizon; in the direction of the ocean, a broken egg-yolk sun fires the line of earth and sky. Surrounding hilltops island the sea of mist.

In the sky, three crows suddenly appear, feathers ruffling like black holes quivering. And disappearing just as quickly, they melt into themselves, becoming distant pinheads. In a punch of energy, three eastern rosellas missile gravity, breaking the edges of the currents of air, ice-cubing the houses below.

Tight, furry cat-balls hunch doormats, expectations waiting to be let inside as I return down the road and into the future.

Award-winning writer, Peter Mitchell lives in the Rainbow Region (NSW), writing poetry, short fiction, memoir, literary criticism and a range of journalism. In 2009, his collection of poetry, The Scarlet Moment (Picaro Press) was published.