Pemberton to River Road

Josephine Clarke

Out of the Asylum Writers Group, j.sephine.c@gmail.com

Recommended Citation

The path tunnels us through a low canopy of green, glisten and tangle. Rain drums heavily and we all sigh, the walkers and the trees.
It is the second week of the first rains and water runs with a knowing we try to learn, of where to go and what to do.
Sodden bark and leaves are gentle on our soles. We keep our heads down, eyes on the path till rhythm rises and drives our shoes. A metronome of drops. We carry our own repenting, count forgotten loves.
The karri, freshly skinned, wet tangerine, are steadfast beside our gusting thoughts. Oh, and the sun on the wet —the night stars glittering the day.

By afternoon we have no room for other landscapes, past selves. We trace hills and valleys knitted with trees, where rivers once snaked beneath wheeling skies. Cascading mosses and lichens collar trunks. Again and again fungi in burnt rust, bright orange surprise the trance of our treading, draw us in and in to bush revelling in rain.

-Josephine Clarke
Josephine Clarke lived in the South-West of Western Australia before studying Literature at UWA. She has had poems and short stories published in several Australian journals including Westerly and Cordite. 